Fly on the Wall

Read all about it

Adam Stone, Examiner publisher, foreground, and Martin Wilbur, editor-in-chief.

A group of area journalists is preparing for the September 11 launch of two new community weeklies covering Mount Kisco and Pleasantville: The Examiner.

The Examiner's editorial and business team consists mostly of former employees from North County News, a Yorktown-based weekly, and The Journal News.

"The media universe has expanded to the point where we know what happens in Iraq moments after it occurs, yet we do less and less reporting on our neighborhoods and our neighbors," Managing Editor Danny Lopriore said in a prepared statement.

The free papers one targeting Pleasantville, the other Mount Kisco and both called The Examiner will publish each Tuesday and be distributed at area businesses and other locations.

Labor Day respites

Seamus Otuirisce shares some quality time with his dog, Diver.

The lads step from the shaded oasis of The Heritage on McLean Avenue in Yonkers for a bit of conviviality in the sunshine beside the pub's Irish-themed mural on Labor Day. Just a hurley shot away, Seamus Otuirisce, 45, and his dog, Diver, take a break in Van Cortlandt Park. Diver's mother was an Irish wolfhound and his father was a bulldog from a good neighborhood, Otuirisce reports. Otuirisce was raised in the very same pub favored by William Butler Yeats "Daily," he insists at Innisfree. (A hurley is the stick used in hurling and a common site in the heavily Irish neighborhood.)
